There are thousands of people, yo and old, in this city, who never have anyone to make a Christmas for them. There's my car; sorry I must go. Don't get blue; take my advice, adopt a family of your own for Christmas," and the girl hurried away. "Adopt a family, great idea!" said Robert to himself; but the idea still lingered in his mind, and really there was something strangely fascinating in the thought of the ownership of a real, live family.

He stood on the corner, undecided where to go, because it did not really matter to anybody where he went; a bright-eyed, clear-brained, lovinghearted youth, candidate for sonship to some loving mother or father; possessed with a perfect passion for helping those weaker than himself; a youth to make a mother's heart supremely happy, and a father proud

"I'm earning enough," thought Robert. "I could support a mother and a sister, too; and I'm going to be promoted. Mr. Wilkins, the manager, told me so to-day. But what's the use? "Yes," answered Robert, "it's just, the right number and description; a dear little mother and two little maid ens of three and ten."

For a minute or two Mrs. Robbins feared she was harboring an escaped lunatic, but Robert, perceiving her perplexity, hastened to explain. As he graciously listened to Mrs.

Robbins' words of gratitude, he took a mental inventory of the possibilities of the Robbins' household with a view to a Christmas-day celebration. The field was evidently undeveloped. Not a doll, nor a picture-book; not a set of dishes nor a Noah's ark was to be seen. "It's all straight sailing on the toy question," thought Robert, "and by the appearance of their clothes, I guess I can't go far wrong if I lay in a complete wardrobe for the girls."

O sons and brothers who grumble over Christmas shopping for mothers and sisters, you can never experience the zest with which Robert Allerton started upon his first Christmas shopping tour. It was the realization of the accumulated dreams of a dozen years.
